

The ability of politically partisan media to require that local stations of a media corporation carry explicitly politically slanted programs--particularly within the brief time frame before the election--is tantamount to electioneering outside the polling station, which is forbidden by law. The FCC has never been more clearly challenged to act in keeping with their mandate, one which is sacred to a democratic republic.